HICKORY

HICKORY'S Hideaway

SWEATING, growling, cursing, the three bank bandits toiled up the mountainside with the loot from their last holdup. Sure that pursuit was far behind, they threw themselves down to rest at last on a grassy slope.

"I still don't see why we hadda ditch the car and climb up here," the fat bandit complained. "We coulda been a hundred miles away by now."

"You're stupid," the leader growled. "Five minutes after we shot our way out of that bank, they had every road blocked. We'd have been picked up long ago. Up here there's nothing but wilderness and a few dumb hillbilly yokels. We can hide out until the heat's off and get away clear."

At that moment it was Hickory's bad luck to come bounding out of the forest, whistling gaily, his thoughts far away. He stopped short, staring from the three evil, glowering faces to the three deadly automatics that had whipped up to cover him. He saw that these three were strangers and it was not hard to guess that they were no casual visitors or honest hunters.

"Howdy, gents," Hickory said after a moment. "Reckon I almost ran over you-all before I saw you."

The leader jerked his head. "Come here, you. What are you doing around here?"

"Why," Hickory said. "I live up there about a mile with Paw. I was just down having a look at Mehitabel's cave."

"Cave?" the leader barked. "Take us to it right away, kid—and don't try any funny stuff."

"Okay," Hickory said. "But Mehitabel ain't gonna like . . ."

"Who cares what Mehitabel likes? Get going."

"Who's Mehitabel?" the fat man demanded nervously.

"How should I know?" the leader growled. "These hillbilly's got a million relatives. Shut up and come on. Maybe it's the spot we need to hole up in."

A few minutes' walk brought them to a clean, dry cave that lay back under immense boulders on the mountainside, its mouth almost hidden from the casual passerby. At the sight of it the leader's eyes glowed. He eyed Hickory thoughtfully. "I hate to do this, kid, but we got to hide out here and a hideout's no good with you running around yapping about it. It's your tough luck."

He raised the deadly automatic. Hickory felt a cold chill run down his spine but he kept his face straight and his mind working at top speed. Maybe he wasn't educated in fancy schools but he knew plenty about life and people. He said, as calmly as he could. "It wouldn't be so good to shoot me, mister. When I didn't come home tonight, Paw'd bring my old dog to find me and you'd be seen."

"That's right," the leader said. He jabbed the gun into Hickory's side. "Then listen, punk. You run along and forget you saw us. Understand? If you blab and we get caught, we'll see that you get shot if it's the last thing we do. Is that clear?"

"It sure is," Hickory said. "And I ain't aimin' to get myself shot yet awhile. But I still think Mehitabel . . ."

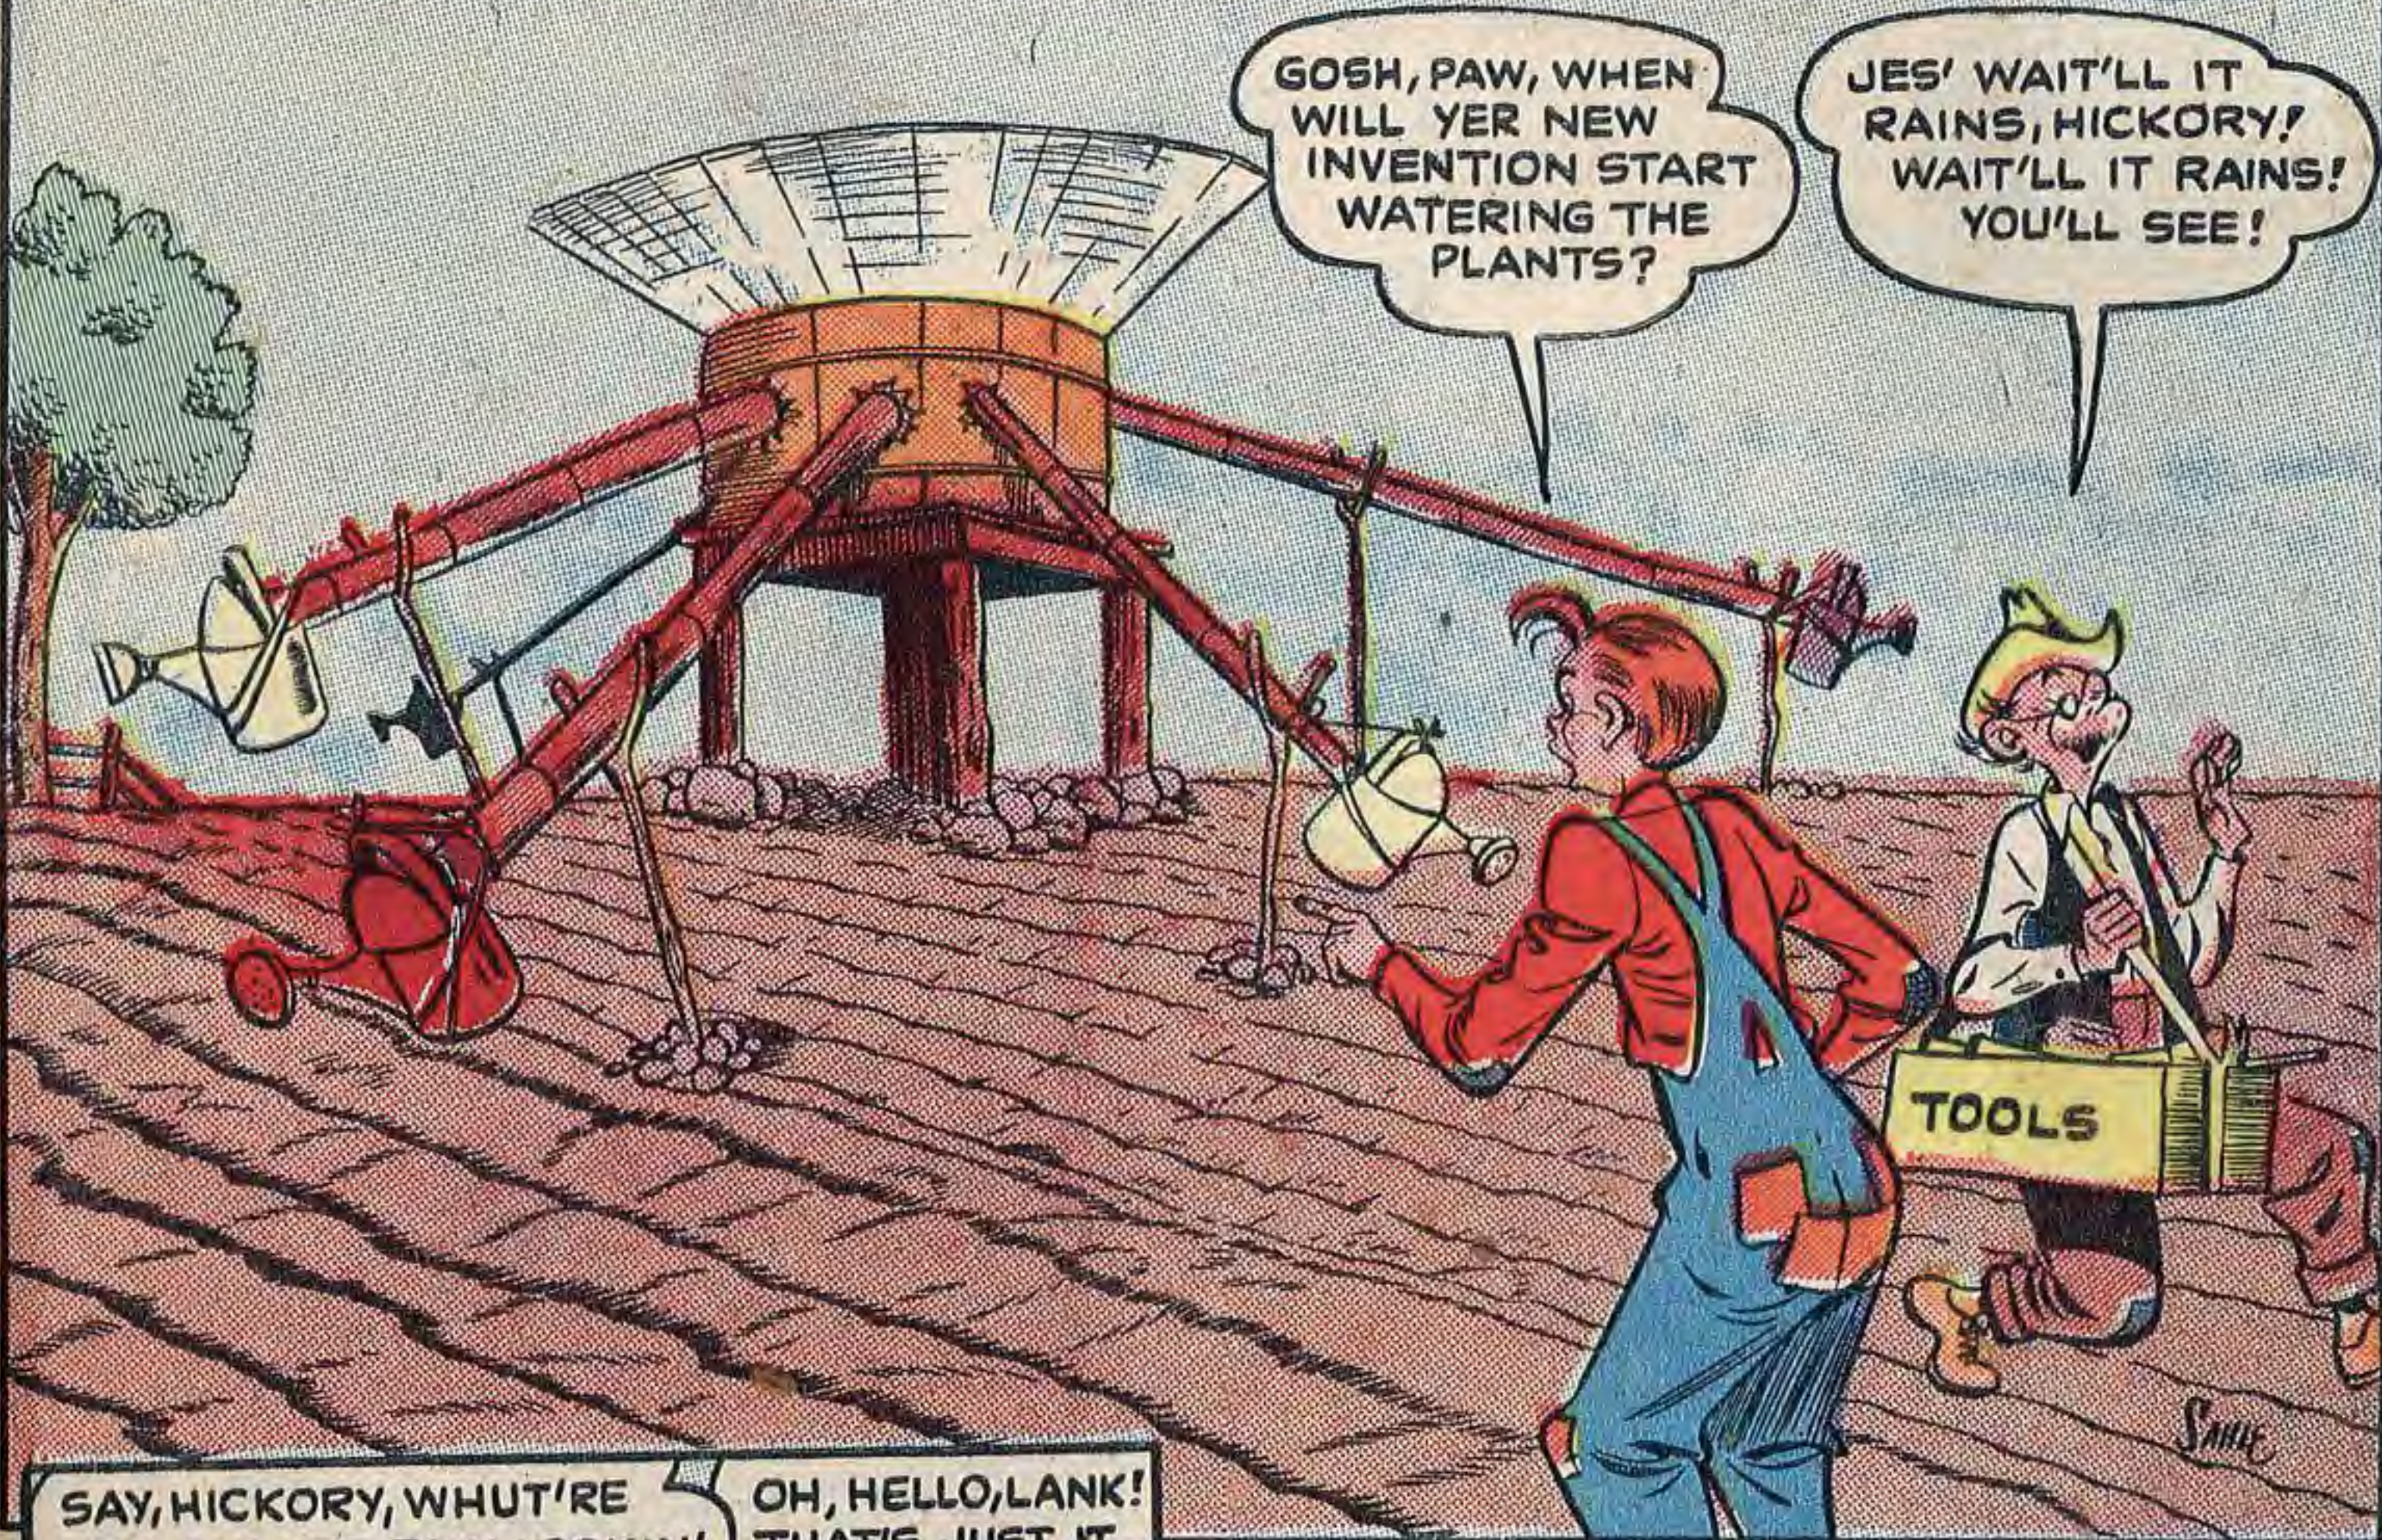

"Blast Mehitabel!" roared the leader. "Get out and keep quiet!"

Hickory hurried home, glad to be alive. On the way up the trail, he shook his head sadly. "Some folks," he muttered, "just won't let a body give 'em advice. Stubborn, that's all. And it serves 'em right."

It was shortly after dawn the next morning when the Sheriff and his posse toiled up the mountainside and met Hickory and Paw in the yard. The Sheriff quickly described the fugitive bandits. "You seen anybody like that?"

Hickory sniffed the air and grinned faintly. "Yep, Sheriff. I can lead you right to 'em—by scent. About now they're out buryin' their clothes somewhere near the cave where Mehitabel, my pet skunk, and all her skunk pals like to get together every morning. They've got guns but by now I don't think they'll feel much like usin' 'em."
